Lazy, hazy, crazy thoughts - like abandoning 3G
 Published July 26 2010 01:00:00 | Last updated August 27 2010 09:00:00
 It is time for the European telecommunications industry to think the unthinkable and abandon 3G - third-generation mobile telephony
 And that's just one of the unthinkable thoughts that chief executives should be contemplating as they head off for their summer holidays. Enough has changed in the world in the past few years to make it obligatory for any boss worth his salt to consider a completely different approach to business.
 The decision by Spain's Telefonos and Finland's Sonera to abandon their joint 3G plans in Germany in the election, signals to re-evaluate this essential technology.

Cadres. High salaries that do not match the performance of executives are a major cause of the flight of talent from France. How can we attract and retain the best? (voir page 17 à 19)

Setting the Scene On the evening of September 11, 2001, Americans across the nation gathered in grief. Many people wept openly. Some held candles. On the steps of the Capitol Building, the leaders of Congress, Democrats and Republicans alike, stood shoulder to shoulder, united in a new resolve "to fight evil."

The candlelight vigils marked the end of a tragic day that saw the Twin Towers of the World Trade Center, the tallest buildings in New York and symbols of American financial might, the towers hit and collapsed. A third hijacked plane struck American military headquarters at the Pentagon. A fourth crashed in Pennsylvania. An estimated 3,000 to 4,000 people died. It was the deadliest day in American soil in more than a century.
 As you have read, the United States was affected with...

 Captain Everard Gault wounded the boy in the right shoulder on the night of June the twenty-first, nineteen twenty-one. Aiming shore the trespasser's heads in the darkness, he fired the single shot from an upstairs window and then watched the three figures scuffling off, the wounded one assisted by his companions.
 They had come to fire the breeze, they had...
